

Demantoid

Demantoid, a variety of the garnet family, is a gemstone that commands attention and captivates with its emerald, like hue. First discovered in the Ural Mountains of Russia in the 19th century, it was soon adored by royals and artists alike, finding a place in the imperial creations of Carl Fabergé. Known for its breathtaking dispersion, demantoid radiates an intense fire, its light splitting into a spectrum of rainbow colors, much like the brilliance of diamonds. But what truly makes this gemstone rare are its inclusions, particularly the coveted “horsetail”, a natural phenomenon formed by fibrous inclusions that create a delicate, feathery pattern within the gem. These inclusions elevate the gemstone's uniqueness and character, making every demantoid a singular work of nature’s art.

Demantoid’s rich green hues are forged deep in the earth, its color coming from chromium, a gift of nature from the Russian mountains. And despite its dazzling appearance, its rarity is undeniable: fewer and fewer demantoid gemstones of significant size are discovered, making it a true collector's prize. Today, this captivating stone is found in limited locales, including the Ural Mountains, Iran, and Madagascar, but it is the Russian demantoid that remains the epitome of luxury and desire.

The Story Behind Arun's Fascination for the Gemstone : Demantoid

Arun’s fascination with demantoid goes beyond its brilliant color and ethereal fire; it’s the energy of the gemstone, its rich history, and the way it lights up the soul that draws him in. “It’s a stone that doesn't ask for attention, but commands it,” he muses with a glint of mischief in his voice. “When you hold it, you feel like you’re holding a secret, a bit of nature’s magic.”

In Arunashi, demantoid represents a marriage of nature and artistry. For Arun, it’s not just about using a rare gemstone; it’s about honoring the stories it carries. “The history of the Ural Mountains is in that gem. The czars, Fabergé, even the very earth itself,” Arun says, as if speaking of a long, lost love affair between the gem and the land. He incorporates demantoid into his creations as a tribute to that history, to the romance of the Ural Mountains, and to the deep connections that form when light, love, and art collide. Each piece with demantoid becomes more than a jewel, it is a reflection of the intimate dance between the earth’s fire and the soul's desires.

The allure of demantoid, with its near, diamond, like brilliance, speaks to Arun’s artistic spirit, one that finds beauty in the rare and in the obscure. But beyond the surface, the “horsetail” inclusion in demantoid brings something even more precious: character. Just as every person is shaped by their experiences, each demantoid gemstone tells its own tale, adding a sense of individuality to every piece. “There’s something poetic about those inclusions,” Arun says with a smile. “It’s like the stone carries a memory, a narrative, much like we all do.”

For Arun, demantoid is not just a gemstone, it’s a metaphor for the journey of life itself. It’s vibrant, complex, and deeply intertwined with the forces of history, nature, and the human spirit. And in every piece of Arunashi jewelry that houses a demantoid, Arun invites the wearer to become part of that very story, to bask in the fire and light of one of nature’s most extraordinary creations.
