

French Carré Cut

The French Carré Cut diamond is elegance squared. Rooted in early French cutting traditions, it favors precision over performance, structure over excess. Its clean, geometric facets create a composed, cerebral play of light, measured, intentional, and quietly persuasive. This is a diamond for those who notice details, not declarations.

Diamonds are formed deep within the earth and discovered across storied regions such as South Africa, Botswana, Namibia, Russia's Yakutia, Canada's Northwest Territories, Australia, and the historic Golconda region of India, each origin lending its own geological nuance.

The Story Behind Arun's Fascination for the Diamond : French Carré Cut

Arun is drawn to the French Carré Cut because it doesn't try too hard, and never needs to. Its square discipline carries a certain defiance: light contained, not unleashed. It feels thoughtful, intelligent, slightly amused by louder forms of beauty. For Arun, this cut reflects a belief that restraint can be seductive. That geometry can be emotional. That true confidence lives in precision and clarity. The French Carré Cut offers nowhere to hide, and that honesty appeals to him deeply.

In Arunashi, this diamond becomes a quiet provocation, an object of intellect and intention. It's for those who understand that the most compelling conversations, like the most enduring beauty, unfold slowly, deliberately, and with just enough mischief to keep things interesting.
