

Old Mine Cut

Old Mine cut diamonds are the ancestors of modern brilliance, hand, shaped in the candlelit salons of 18th and 19th century Europe, long before electricity revealed their fire in harsher light. With their rounded square outline, small table, high crown, and a deep pavilion, they were fashioned by artisans who worked by instinct and flame rather than mathematics and machines. The result is a gemstone that glows like memory itself: soft, romantic, alive with the warmth of history.

Most often found in diamonds mined in Brazil and later South Africa, these cuts are time capsules of an era when every facet was guided by the hand, not the algorithm.

The Story Behind Arun's Fascination for the Diamond : Old Mine Cut

Arun is drawn to the Old Mine cut not for perfection, but for its imperfection, the poetry of a human hand shaping light. These diamonds remind him that beauty is not always in symmetry, but in character. They are gemstones with a heartbeat, carrying centuries of whispers within their faceting.

For him, they are the most mischievous of diamonds: refusing to conform to the crisp, industrial brilliance of today, instead radiating a softer glow that feels more intimate, more secretive. They are conversation pieces, the kind you lean toward over candlelight to fully appreciate.

Arun uses Old Mine cut diamond centers because they embody the rebellion at the core of Arunashi, where the past is never discarded but alchemized into something future-facing. To him, they are not relics, but living echoes: a reminder that history is not behind us, but inside us, refracting endlessly like light through an ancient facet.
