

Trapezoid Cut

Diamond trapezoidal cuts are the avant, garde beauties of the gemstone world, cut with sharp angles and sophisticated lines, they break away from tradition. Their structure, with two parallel sides and two slanted ones, creates a striking silhouette that commands attention. While the round brilliant and princess cuts dominate the stage, the trapezoid shape remains an understated yet bold statement, a sleek tribute to modern geometry. When cut to perfection, diamond trapezoidal cut display a unique brilliance, their facets reflecting light in dynamic patterns that seem to dance with movement.

The Story Behind Arun's Fascination for the Diamond : Trapezoid Cut

Arun's attraction to diamond trapezoidal cut goes beyond their stunning, angular shape. "The trapezoid is a shape that says, 'I don't need to be round or conventional to be stunning,'" Arun muses, his eyes twinkling with a playful curiosity. "There's something about the trapezoid that feels unapologetically confident. It's angular, distinct, and above all, it refuses to blend in."

Arunashi's pieces often embody this same refusal to settle for the ordinary. Arun's designs revel in the unexpected, the surprise of a shape that feels simultaneously modern and timeless. "The trapezoid mirrors my philosophy of design. It's not about what's expected; it's about what's right for the moment. It's about bold, architectural elegance," he explains.

Using diamond trapezoidal cut allows Arun to infuse his creations with a sense of balance and symmetry, a nod to the structure that exists in nature and the universe. "Look at the way the universe forms, there's geometry everywhere. From the way the stars align to the way we look at art. Geometry is a language, and the trapezoid speaks it fluently. It's more than just a shape, it's a perfect fusion of strength and beauty," he says, as though he's sharing a secret with you.

In Arunashi, these diamonds are more than just an aesthetic choice, they're a reminder that true elegance doesn't follow rules. It makes them. Each diamond trapezoidal cut in an Arunashi design is a story of individuality, of striking out on one's own path. And isn't that what all great adventures are about? "In a world full of round and square diamonds, trapezoids are the rebels, the ones who stand tall and proud," Arun says with a grin. "I like to think of them as the diamonds with character, much like the people who wear them."

For Arun, it's not about following the trends, but about finding beauty in the unexpected. And the diamond trapezoidal cut, in all its angular glory, is a perfect fit for the Arunashi world, where art, love, and geometry all converge.
